The Harbinger's Head Download Xbox 360 Free

The dullahan waits, a question hanging in the air. How, exactly, can you prove you didn't take it?

There's only one way, of course. To prove your innocence, you must prove someone else's guilt. With a sinking feeling in your stomach, you force the bitter words out of your mouth.

You will help him find the thief.

Though his movements are subtle, some of the tension leaves the dullahan's shoulders and stance. You sense he is surprised and at least considering your proposal. On the one hand, you dread his acceptance—but on the other hand, it does seem to be your only chance to survive this encounter.

Perhaps a little additional convincing is in order? What might make your assistance valuable to the dullahan?

- My courage is unequaled. I will neither flee nor falter till my quest is complete.
- Deadly or not, this creature is clearly hurt by his loss. What is a dullahan without his head? I have no ulterior motives; I only want to help.
- For the right price, I am capable of anything. Even recovering a stolen head.
- I'll do anything he wants as long as he doesn't kill me! I will do his bidding without question, I swear!
- What happened to this creature, regardless of his nature, is wrong. My intentions are

One heavy, grimy palm clamps down hard over your mouth, muffling your screams. Something sharp and cold presses against your throat as you are dragged backward off of the road and into the shadow of the woods.

"Stand an' deliver," grumbles a voice in your ear. A sudden overwhelming stench of alcohol and God knows what else overwhelms your poor, unprepared nostrils, making you gag.

Your assailant laughs in a mad sort of half-cackle, half-sob. "Don't exactly look rich, do ye? No matter. Give me what you got. Or else."

What do you do?

- Fight back! If I act quickly, I'll have the element of surprise on my side.
- Maybe he'll let me live if I do as he says?
- I'll do as he asks for now and wait for an opportune moment to escape.

Hound, he falters for a moment, glancing up with an incredulous look in his eyes. He doesn't answer right away. Though you can tell by the way he's acting that the answer is yes, you worry he might not be willing to divulge anything further.

Perhaps it is because of your history together, however distant, or perhaps it is because your question caught him so off-guard. Whatever the reason, Eamon chooses to speak. "Your grandfather always did say you had the Sight."

He casts a quick look around as though to confirm no one is eavesdropping. "A couple of months ago, I noticed missing food and drink that could not be accounted for in the ledgers. I questioned the staff, but no one confessed, and no proof against any of them emerged then or since. I considered that perhaps some sort of vermin were to blame, but I've yet to find proof of that either. I run a clean establishment, just as Father did."

Here he frowns. "Some of the staff are convinced that the culprit is...of unnatural origin. Some of the girls claim that it pulls on their skirts and the ribbons in their hair when they enter the cellar, and a man who was caught attempting to steal a drink from one of the kegs swore that something attacked him, scratching at his ankles and tripping him up."

Eamon looks away, busying himself once more with tending to the glassware. "Some say they've also heard singing in the cellar. But of course, it's more likely than not just some trick of the senses."

What now?

- Ask to see the cellar.
- Talk about something else.

Captain McDowell blinks, clearly startled by your blunt inquiry. "How did you know about that?"

You explain that you've heard rumors about the incident.

"And why exactly," asks the captain, his eyes intent upon your face, "are you interested in this alleged incident?"

"I'm trying to help someone right a wrong that was done to them."

"It's a matter of grave peril. I can't say more than that."

"Please. My life depends on it."
