3.4 | Optimality versus Pareto improvement in climate change

Assessment of a change normally requires benefits to be weighed against costs. An exception is a change – known as a Pareto improvement – that benefits some people without harming anyone. Climate change provides one possible example. GHG externality: a person whose activities emit GHG does not bear the full cost of their activities; some of the costs are borne by those who are harmed by the emissions. Consequently, climate change causes Pareto inefficiency, which means that a Pareto improvement would in principle be possible. Indeed it would be possible to remove the inefficiency in a way that requires no sacrifice by anyone in any generation, compared to business-as-usual. To achieve this result, the present generation must reallocate investment towards projects that reduce emissions of GHG, maintaining its own consumption. Because it maintains its own consumption, the present generation makes no sacrifice, so it reduces its conventional investment, this generation acquires less conventional capital to future generations. Other things being equal, this reallocation would make future generations well off, but the reduction in emissions will more than offset them for that loss (Stern, forthcoming; Foley, 2009; et al., 2011).

It is commonly assumed that climate change calls for sacrifices by the present generation for the sake of future generations. Figure 3.4 illustrates why. The possibility frontier shows what combinations of consumption are possible for present and future generations. Because of the externality, business-as-usual lies below this frontier. The frontier can be reached by a Pareto improvement. Two contours of two different social welfare functions are shown: one SWF places more weight on future consumption relative to present consumption. The two contours reflect in a purely illustrative frontier is the social optimum according to that function. Neither optimum is a Pareto improvement on business-as-usual. Although the inefficiency could be removed without any sacrifices, the outcomes described by both Stern and Nordhaus do require sacrifice by the present generation.

From an international rather than an intergenerational perspective, it is also true on the same grounds that the inefficiency of climate change can be removed without any nation making a sacrifice (Posner and Weisbach, 2010). But it does not follow that this would be the best outcome.
